What is Phonemic Awareness Phonemic Awareness is defined as the ability to identify, hear, and work with the smallest units of sound known as phonemes. Children usually learn to read beginning around the ages of 5 or 6. In the United States, this will typically be around first grade. Though there are many methods for teaching reading to... Some children have a more difficult time differentiating between phonemes than other students. Take note of students who seem to be struggling and try to spend a bit of extra time with them.[2] X Research source. Be on the lookout for children who might be suffering from dyslexia. Dyslexia is a not uncommon problem for many people, and it is often identified when children begin to learn to read. Revised edition of: Effective reading strategies : teaching children who find reading difficult. c2004. Includes bibliographical references (pages 278-287) and indexes. Setting the stage for helping struggling readers -- Determining instructional needs : assessing readers in action -- Creating an instructional framework -- Developing positive attitudes about reading -- Preventing reading problems through early literacy experiences -- Overcoming difficulties in word recognition -- Developing fluent reading in struggling readers -- Building deep and wide vocabularies in st Even children who can decode words and "read" with great fluency still might not be able to comprehend what they are reading. If a child can't comprehend what he is reading, there really is no point to reading at all! While your child is a baby, ask him questions such as, "Do you see the cat?" while pointing at the picture of the cat. Teaching children word families is a phonemic awareness activity that helps children see patterns in reading. This is an important skill because it allows children to begin "reading" by grouping sets of letters within a word. Sometimes this task is tedious, though, so it's important to find creative ways to make it fun. When I taught first grade, I used to buy little finger puppets that my students could use to point to the letters as they were decoding.
