Expository writing is long on facts and short on storytelling and literary flourishes. It can inform or instruct readers about a subject, but in its purest form, it's not out to change anyone's mind. The narrative style of writing tells a story. Its hallmark is a plot with a beginning, middle, and end, like so: Romeo and Juliet's families loathe each other. The two star-crossed lovers fall for each other anyway. Tragedy ensues. Examples of narrative writing: Novels. Creative nonfiction (e.g. magazine features). Essentials of Writing Content. But writing and redrafting aren't the only stages you need to go through to produce an effective piece of writing. Every finished writing project, big or small, passes through four stages: Planning. If you're struggling with a particular piece of writing, there's a good chance that you've skipped a step somewhere or that you've tried to do everything at once. Stage #1: Planning.
