The parable of the lost sheep is used to help the audience understand that God is not just concerned with the "greatest" in the kingdom. He does not want even one little child to be lost (Matthew 18:14). In Luke's account Jesus told the parable to help the Pharisees understand that God loves each and every sinner. The Pharisees did not understand why Jesus was spending so much time with the sinners. For a craft idea draw a simple lamb (or copy one from a child's colouring book) and then let the children glue cotton wool on it. However, this dedication to a child of three incurred a review from the Monthly Review stating, "This version of the parables is, with great propriety, dedicated to Master Bonnell George Thorton: a child of three years old", which was intended to mock the simplicity of the Parables.[1] The Critical Review simply stated that the work revealed Christopher Smart's poetry as being "unequal" and of "the lower class", and while it "may certainly be of use" to children, it could not "please their imaginations, or improve their taste in poetry."
