The National Action Party (Spanish: Partido Acción Nacional, PAN), founded in 1939, is a conservative political party in Mexico, one of the four main political parties in Mexico. Since the 1980s, it has been an important political party winning local, state, and national elections. In 2000, PAN candidate Vicente Fox was elected president for a six-year term; in 2006, PAN candidate Felipe Calderón succeeded Fox in the presidency. During the period 2000–2012, PAN was the strongest party in both houses.

Ideological Politics in Mexico -- Political Alienation of the Right: The Intellectual Origins of Accion Nacional -- Maderismo Revisited: The Political Ideology of PAN -- The Influence of PAN on Public Policy -- Three Phases in PAN's Electoral Participation -- Prospects for the Future: A Conclusion. National Action Party (PAN) , Spanish Partido Acción Nacional , conservative Mexican political party with close ties to the Roman Catholic Church . It generally supports minimal government intervention in the economy. Britannica Quiz. Over the next six decades it was the principal opposition party to the ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party (Partido Revolucionario Institucional; PRI). The PAN first contested national elections in 1943, but until the late 1980s it generally fared poorly at all levels, which was largely the result of the broad patronage system that the PRI had developed and the frequent use by the PRI of electoral fraud to secure its dominant status. In the 1980s the PAN became outspoken in its allegations of electoral fraud against the PRI. Acción Nacional, Mexico's primary opposition political party, has not won a major election in its thirty-three year history, even though its Catholic activist leaders use Catholic reform doctrine in a Catholic country. The explanation of this paradox lies in the successful Mexican Revolution and its aftermath. Identification with the Church, or Catholicism in general, is counterproductive to political success. Further, since 1928 the Revolutionary government has so controlled the political system that only its political party has any hope of governing the country. In spite of all this, Acción Nacional was created in 1939 to offer what is essentially a Catholic alternative to the Revolution. Studying such a political party is important for a variety of reasons.
