We all know that the phrase "God helps those who help themselves" is not in the Bible. It's one of those false proverbs that people who don't read the Bible think comes from the Bible. But how many phrases do you think you know of the Bible are actually nothing more than phrases spoken by men? Here's an example, one that I am often asked about in fact: "The lion and the lamb shall lie down together." The convenient alliteration "lion and lamb" is easy to remember. But it is not out of the Bible, at least not as a direct quote. The phrase goes back at most a few centuries and appears in sermons From Thematic Bible. Animals » Lions » Sheep. The Bible stories themselves are well told, and are in pleasingly large chunks that catch the flow of a whole narrative section; the story Bibles I had when I was a kid had tiny little slivers of story a page long or so. It wasn't until after I'd been reading this Bible to my kids for a few weeks that I noticed that there's an unexpected theological angle here: at key points, the author is careful to phrase her stories in subtly naturalistic language. For example, in the dedication of the tabernacle, where the scriptural text says that the visible glory of God filled the taberna (She had, of course, left the door open, for she knew that it is a very silly thing to shut oneself into a wardrobe.) It seemed to be still daylight there. "I can always get back if anything goes wrong," thought Lucy. And so Lucy found herself walking through the wood arm in arm with this strange creature as if they had known one another all their lives. They had not gone far before they came to a place where the ground became rough and there were rocks all about and little hills up and little hills down. At the bottom of one small valley Mr Tumnus turned suddenly aside as if he were going to walk straight into an unusually large rock, but at the last moment Lucy found he was leading her into the entrance of a cave.
