A high level of education is one of the courses of the Finnish national strategy. The main line of the education system is its democratic character: equal opportunities to get an education for every resident in Finland. That means that all foreigners of compulsory school age have the right to receive the same basic education as Finns. There are 2 options: an upper secondary school or a vocational institution. Textbooks and food are not free anymore, but studies are still free. At the same time, education is not free for the foreign students who are studying using English language. Higher education comprises two sectors: universities and polytechnics/higher vocational schools. Universities are mostly oriented for scientific and research works. At upper secondary level and in higher education the students themselves or their parents purchase their own books. In vocational education and training, students in need of special needs education are provided with an individual education plan. First national examination is at the end of general upper secondary education. General upper secondary education ends with a national matriculation examination, which comprises four compulsory tests: mother tongue and, according to each candidate's choice, three of the following: the second national language, a foreign language, mathematics or one subject in general studies, such as humanities and natural. Technical and vocational education and training (TVET) and skills development pose a serious challenge, particularly in countries with rapidly evolving labor markets. The subsector is often under the responsibility of several line ministries. It has, more than any other subsector of education, strong linkages to both formal and nonformal labor markets. The same can be said for diversifying curricula at the secondary level to make graduates more employable. Heterogeneity: TVET serves vastly different clienteles including youth, those with low income, workers, women, disabled, unemployed, and migrants each with their own characteristics, contexts, and constraints.
